Take up rainwater harvesting to ensure long-term water security in villages: CM

The Hindu Bureau CHENNAI

Chief Minister M.K. Stalin on Saturday urged representatives of local bodies to take up rainwater harvesting, stating that it would replenish groundwater levels and provide long-term water security to villages.

The Chief Minister, who interacted with around 10,000 representatives of local bodies during a webinar, dedicated a major portion of his speech to clean drinking water, sanitation, and the use of plastics, waste management, disease prevention, and environmental protection.

Mr. Stalin said water security was an important issue that required immediate attention. "There is a saying, 'spending money like water, but in reality we have to use water as if it were gold'," he said. The representatives should educate the public and create awareness on water management and sewerage treatment.

"You may wonder whether there is any need to speak about these issues, but if we pay attention to small matters, we will reap major benefits. Health is wealth, and it can be achieved only through sanitation," he said.

"There should be no laxity in keeping our villages clean," he said, adding that everyone should keep the villages clean and reduce the use of plastic. "Do not litter on the streets. We have a responsibility as our village is like our home. So we were spending money. Rainwater harvesting alone can prevent water scarcity," he said. He also drew the representatives' attention to global warming.

"We are not receiving adequate rainfall at the right time. Climate change is one of the reasons for this. We must create awareness among the public about this issue," he said. The Chief Minister
